COURSE SUMMARY

Psycholinguistics is the discipline responsible for studying and explaining the mental processes involved in the understanding, production, acquisition and loss of language. This approach is operative for the teaching of first and second languages since it accounts for the processes and mental representations that are carried out in the coding and decoding of the language. In this course we will present a panorama of consensus knowledge and some of the debates still open in the different subfields of research in the area: language and cognition, the biological bases of language, the mental lexicon, mental and neurological processes involved in syntactic processing - both in comprehension and in the production of sentences-, in reading and in bilingualism.

The preceding theoretical reflections will be directed mainly to the development of empirically based strategies for the teaching-learning of Spanish as a second language.
